

What we do, and where we stop

Talking points — one line each. Say them, don't read them.

THE PROBLEM

- Getting a gun license in New York City is one of the hardest permits in the country to get
- Takes about six months — long list of documents, most of them have to be notarized
- Half of them expire while you're waiting on the other half
- Most people either give up partway through, or hire someone running it out of a filing cabinet

WHAT WE DO

- We tell people exactly what their situation requires — not the generic list, theirs
- We prepare the paperwork
- We chase down the reference letters and get them notarized
- We track every deadline so nothing goes stale while they wait
- They can log in any time and see exactly where their case stands
- At the end they review it, sign it, and submit it themselves — that part is always theirs

WHERE WE ARE

- We launched recently and we're in beta
- Every client we're working with right now is non-paying — deliberately
- We're testing the system on real cases before we take money for it
- Including a harder one: an armed guard applying through his employer, so two people are working the same application

WHERE WE STOP

- We're not attorneys, we don't represent anyone, and we don't promise anyone an outcome
- We built the whole business around that line

“But we drew that line ourselves — and that’s really why I wanted to talk to you.”
